Subject: Application for Business Analyst (Fixed-Term), Makati City

Dear Hiring Team,

I am applying for the Business Analyst role because the work I did best at the World Meteorological Organization (WMO) was getting people onto better systems: understanding what they needed, testing with them, and helping the change stick. I am based in the Philippines and available to work onsite in Makati City for the 12-month term.

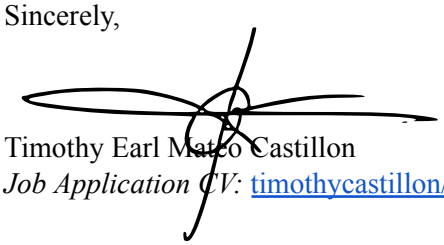

At WMO, part of my duties was to test new Microsoft tools and work out how they could best serve our systems. I would prototype against specific business needs, put the tool in front of a few primary users, revise it from their feedback, then open it to wider testing. When I replaced fragmented Excel tracking with a SharePoint list for 100+ projects, I tested early versions with lead Programme Managers, found where the workflow slowed them down and, from their input, automated metadata tagging to cut manual entry. I used the same approach for our migration to the new intranet.

I also co-led the staff adoption campaign for that migration, using segmented emails and training tailored to each department's workflow. We reached over 80% of staff and saw fewer IT support requests, because we put clear self-service guidance in place before launch. With HR, I partnered on onboarding and offboarding roadmaps so new hires could reach role-specific knowledge faster and departing staff could pass on what was not written down, and I coordinated a three-month pilot of an internal mentoring programme with 20 colleagues (10 mentors, 10 mentees) that HR then continued. Each of these followed the pattern in your posting: understand the need, design with the people affected, test, adjust, and support the change after launch.

I should be clear about what I have not done. I have not held a business analyst title, I have not completed Lean Six Sigma, and my process work has been practical rather than formal as-is/to-be mapping or gap analysis. I am keen to learn your methods, and I bring a track record of learning tools quickly, a foundation in project management (Google Project Management certificate, Agile, MEAL Essentials), and working experience across UN agencies and multi-national teams. I work in English and have basic French.

I would welcome the chance to discuss how my experience could support the Business Transformation Team.

Sincerely,

Timothy Earl Mateo Castillon
